linuxtrash-0.1.0-1.tar.gz Linux & Unix Commands. Shortcut to the find command. With shortcuts for common file operations. Among the notable features of Meld are the ability to merge two files, the option to select blocks of text within a file, compare two files, and tag text for highlighting. Features include automatic word wrapping of long lines and support for displaying text in different fonts. Meld is available for various Unix-like operating systems including Linux, FreeBSD and OpenBSD, as well as Windows. It is a command line tool with a text-based user interface that runs in a terminal window. Introduction "Meld" is a "diff" (or "difference") tool for Unix-like systems that displays the differences between two text files in a tree structure. It is intended to make it easy to see what is different, in a visually appealing way, and to identify the differences quickly. You can run it from the command line or display the difference in the Meld window. You can also launch it from the GUI and select which files to compare. The Meld window provides a few buttons: in the top left, there is a toggle button that toggles whether to show changes as vertical red lines (top) or horizontal blue lines (bottom). There are also buttons that toggles showing the content of the selected file in a separate window (alternative file, left); toggle button to open a second window (alternative file, right); and toggle button to quickly toggle between the current (main) window and a different window. There are also buttons for "Remove" and "Toggle Mark". The basic use is to run "meld file1 file2" to see the differences between file1 and file2. This command works only when the files are text files (not binary files). This version is a rewrite of "meld" by Jos Buivenga from the 0.2.1 version. The rewrite was needed because of the many bugs in 0.2.1, and more importantly because it did not work with Unicode and Linux's new line character (LF) in any case.
