dramatic rise in the incidence of thyroid cancer worldwide, particularly in women. While this increase has been attributed to increased diagnostic activity and technological advances, increased radiation exposure is also a likely major contributor. This increase in thyroid cancer incidence contrasts with the lack of a parallel rise in differentiated thyroid carcinoma (DTC), the common variant of thyroid cancer. Thyroid cancer incidence is higher for women (3.7 cases per 100,000 women) than for men (2.7 cases per 100,000 men). This gender discrepancy in the incidence of thyroid cancer has been attributed to the observation that the incidence of radiation-associated thyroid cancers and thyroid cancers induced by treatment of non-DTC is significantly higher in women than in men. Nonetheless, the prevalence of DTC in women and in radiation-associated thyroid cancer is still several fold higher in women than in men. The gender difference in the risk of developing thyroid cancer is also reflected in the higher mortality rate in women. This application will examine the contribution of radiation to the gender difference in the development of thyroid cancer. To accomplish this we will pursue three specific aims. 1) We will determine whether the increased frequency and mortality of thyroid cancer in women is caused by radiation-induced thyroid cancers and whether this is more common in older women. 2) We will determine whether genes involved in thyroid carcinogenesis in mice are also involved in human thyroid cancer development. 3) We will determine whether the age-related increase in thyroid cancer incidence, and the low preclinical sensitivity to thyroid carcinogens are due to a radiation-induced deficiency in the expression of genes involved in the mechanisms of cellular response to DNA-damaging agents. An improved understanding of the mechanisms and risk factors for thyroid cancer is essential to reducing its morbidity and mortality. Theresa May will set out the final terms of her Brexit deal with the European Union on Monday as the latest round of talks between British and EU negotiators got under way in Brussels. 6d1f23a050
