On Thursday, French cabinet minister and former presidential candidate François Bayrou confirmed that in the lead-up to the French presidential election, he was approached by the Democratic Movement (MoDem) and Jean-Luc Mélenchon's far-left Front de Gauche to join the presidential race, explaining, "There were intense conversations but not with me." Bayrou did not specify the character of these conversations but did confirm that he turned them down. Bayrou had previously supported socialist candidate Benoît Hamon and endorsed rival Emmanuel Macron in the French primaries, explaining his decision to support Macron in an interview with Le Figaro before the first round of elections. As recently as February, Bayrou declared that he had thrown his weight behind Macron and that he would "support him when there is a majority," while defending his decision to refuse the backing of the far-right National Front (FN) and the far-left Front de Gauche. As recently as February, Bayrou declared that he had thrown his weight behind Macron and that he would "support him when there is a majority," while defending his decision to refuse the backing of the far-right National Front (FN) and the far-left Front de Gauche. The result of Bayrou's support for Macron? He failed to qualify for the second round of voting, and he is now stating that he will throw his support behind Marine Le Pen, who Bayrou calls "the one who can really get Macron elected." Bayrou's decision is a blow to the Left Front and the Greens, who have both supported Macron in the past in hopes of a unified left vote. Furthermore, with the latest controversy, Bayrou has lost some of the support for his centrist primary campaign.
